19th century have always regarded it as an artificial imposition of colonial mapmakers. The establishment of the Soviet presence in Centr Asia caused armed resistance—in many ways similar to the present Afgh resistance movement—that peaked in the early 1920s but was not finall crushed until the 1930s. That resistance was periodically aided by peoples of northern Afghanistan, and after that resistance failed, man Tajiks, Uzbeks, and Turkmens fled across the border to settle out of reach of Soviet control.
On at least the Afghan side of the border, a folk memory of that struggle has remained alive, according to Western journalists. That memory has emphasized hatred of Soviet-style control and of ethnic Russian domination. Within the USSR, political and police methods hav kept this hostility under control, but Soviet authorities have always been apprehensive about it. Such concern may have been a factor in th Soviet decision to invade Afghanistan.

terrain, sparse population, and the lack of major transportation networks make crossings more difficult. In medium-security areas, watchtowers are usually at 15-to-40-kilometer intervals. The remaining five percent of the border area has only light security. This area, mostly along the Pyandzh River (the upper Amu Darya), is devoid of transportation routes, settlements, or border outposts, and it features extremely rugged terrain, particularly on the Soviet side. This area contains no border guard outposts but is probably patrolled periodically by air and monitored by means of remote surveillance or listening posts.
